Background

The rapid development of the agricultural sector in China, especially after the country's 2001 accession to the WTO, has been driven by market-oriented reform, moving from a centrally-planned to decentralized market system, and from a tightly-controlled to freer trade scheme.

The process of market integration, both domestically and globally, has fundamentally transformed food production, consumption, marketing, as well as policy-making. Improved production efficiency, increased consumption, and implementation of novel and effective institutional policies, have all been successfully realized over the past forty years.

Yet given these achievements, agricultural development in China now faces tremendous challenges that call for solutions. Rising production costs and environmental issues, along with competition from the world's major agricultural producers, demand a restructuring of China's agricultural production toward a system with increased competitiveness and sustainability. Measures need to be taken from innovation in land contract and operating arrangement, gear shift of domestic support policy to the system better adaptive to open-economy, to the enforcement of rules and regulations correcting market failure in agri-environmental protection. Consumers' increasing demand for more and higher quality food puts pressure on upgrading food production and management systems, and highlights the increasing constraint on the world's resources. Concurrently, China has also undergone a massive rural-urban migration. While key to the country's economic development, this fundamental demographic change also makes prominent various problems during the rural-urban transformation. All those issues are in urgent need to be addressed by researchers and policymakers.
